It is (0) the world's biggest finding of human fossils and the (1) ___ important palaeontology site in Europe: a subterranean chamber at the bottom of a 50ft tunnel in the deepest part of the Atapuerca cavern (2) ___ northern Spain. Dozens of ancient skeletons have been found. La Sima de los Huesos – the Pit of Bones – (3) ___ been designated a Unesco world heritage site because of (4) ___ importance to understanding evolution, and millions of euros, donated by the EU, have been spent constructing a museum of human antiquity in nearby Burgos. But Britain's leading expert (5) ___ human evolution, Professor Chris Stringer, of the Natural History Museum, has warned in the journal Evolutionary Anthropology that the team in charge of La Sima has got the ages of its fossils wrong (6) ___ 200,000 years and has incorrectly identified the species of ancient humans found there. Instead of being a 600,000-year-old final resting place of a species called Homo heidelbergensis, he believes the pit is filled with Neanderthal remains that are no more (7) ___ 400,000 years old. The difference in interpretation has very significant implications for understanding human evolution. "The Atapuerca finds are hugely important," said Stringer. "(8) ___ is no other site like it in terms of the numbers of bones and skulls of our ancient predecessors. It is the world's biggest collection of ancient human fossils and the team there has done a magnificent job in excavating the site. (9) ___, if we cannot correctly fix the age and identity of the remains then we are in trouble. Getting that wrong even affects (10) ___ we construct our own evolution."
